SCIENCE CORNER

A heatwave is a prolonged period of unusually high temperatures, often accompanied by high humidity, that lasts for several days or even weeks. It usually occurs during the summer season when temperatures rise significantly above the normal level for a particular region. Heatwaves can have serious effects on people, animals, agriculture, and the environment, sometimes causing health problems such as dehydration, heat exhaustion, and heatstroke.

To stay safe during a heatwave, it is important to drink plenty of water, wear light and comfortable clothing, avoid going out during the hottest part of the day, and stay in cool or shaded places as much as possible.
